A National Shrine

Novo Scotia's Province Home to Stopped in Tradition

While a seven-story, modern provincial office building is being erected alongside it, Novo Scotia's ancient province is being built up today with an 18th century personality that discloses no jealousy.

When the 18th century edifice across the street towers above it, the old colonial building, steeped in the traditions of the province, will be more than 100 years old.

The new building will be the last word in the construction of the province, and it will cost ten times more than was spent on the old building.

But the old building is a national shrine. Kings of England have been crowned on the steps of the building. Famous architects have outlined the plan of the building. Novo Scotia for more than 100 years.
